This project will explore how the lives of archeologists are influenced and changed by their work. Questions will mainly revolved around personal experiences in archeology, thoughts, and passions related to their field. Through looking at these experiences a fuller, more in-depth picture of what it is like to work in archaeology should start to form. Filling in the holes in the grander picture of who the people behind archaeological discoveries are.

My intention as a researcher is to learn more about the people behind archaeological discoveries. It feels like most of the time more recognition is given to the items found or a breakthrough than to the people behind the discoveries. I want to learn more about these people and how they interact with their work. What drove them to choose this path and why do they think it is important. My main drive is my own curiosity and what feels like a lack of representation of archaeologists voices currently.

I am likely to share your interview content, in part or in full, in these ways: At a campus wide presentation for my senior project in June 2019, and on a publicly viewable project page with separate individual interviews on ohla.info.

You can elect to end your participation at any time before or during the interview. You can elect to release all or part of your interview after the interview using the provided release form. If you have any questions about this project or the ways in which your content has been used, you can contact the chair of the Antioch College Institutional Review Board at irb@antiochcollege.edu.

Questions I am likely to ask participants:

1. What drew you to archaeology?
2. When you find artifacts/remains what sorts of emotions do you experience?
3. By looking at artifacts what can you learn about the people behind them? What kinds of thoughts or feelings do you have towards the people?
4. What was your most unusual experience while working at a site?
5. Why do you think archaeology is important? Why is knowledge of past societies relevant to us today?

I wish to participate in this interview project, and do so voluntarily.
